Abstract

The Georgia Basin/ Puget Sound International Airshed Strategy is a work in progress involving agencies from Canada and the United States that have responsibility for air quality issues in this transboundary airshed.

Work began in early 2001 and since then the group has made progress on five key early action items as well as on the airshed characterization, the key science component of the initiative.

The presentation involves an historical overview of the process, highlighting the key accomplishments made to date, the significant work remaining, and the important reasons for action in this sensitive airshed.
